Lärande organisationer i teori och praktik

To counter and act against men,s violence to women necessitates a broad view of the problem. This paper considers three sets of questions. First, I examine the nature and scale of the problem of men,s violence to women, especially known women; and the problem of understanding what violence is. Second, there is the question of ,the problem of men,. A focus on men is necessary in understanding violence; this includes examining links between violence and forms of ,masculinity,. Third, I focus on education as an important perspective in intervention against men,s violence to women. This is a way of looking at both prevention and intervention. I conclude with some remarks on the implications of the educational framework for policy and research, and for opposing violence and working against men,s violence.
